ADMINISTRATIVE HISTORY:

Governor Thomas Carleton and most of his executive arrived in Saint John in November, 1784, to establish the government of New Brunswick and to direct settlement of the new colony. The key officials, besides Carleton, to be involved in land matters were the Provincial Secretary, the Solicitor General, the Attorney General, and the Surveyor General. Guiding Carleton and his executive were colonial precedents, administrative procedures, experience and the royal instructions received from King George III. Among other things, these instructions set out the reasonable terms and proper methods for granting and administering crown lands.

Carleton and His Majesty's Council met almost daily as the Council Committee on Land to supervise and direct the Loyalist settlement. Settlers submitted a petition to the Provincial Secretary's office. The Land Committee (of whom the Provincial Secretary was registrar and clerk) read and acted upon each petition. When a request was complied with the applicant was instructed to advertise in the newspapers. The Committee issued a warrant directing the Surveyor General to conduct a survey and return the warrant and a description of the land surveyed to the Provincial Secretary within six months. Once the survey was completed and fees paid, the patent was signed by the Governor (Lieutenant Governor after 1786) and recorded by the Provincial Secretary and Surveyor General.

Grants averaged 100 acres for head of family and 50 for each additional family member. Military personnel received additional grants for reward of service. Additional allotments could be obtained by those who could afford to pay the quit rents on a larger grant or who had fulfilled the terms of their first grant.

The task of the Surveyor General was to execute the government warrants for the distribution of the crown lands, to return plans, and to descriptions for the patents. His authority extended only to the point where lands were granted. Serious disputes were settled by the Land Committee. The Surveyor General could, however, report abuses to the Attorney General.

In the case where the Crown escheated the land for non-compliance with granting regulations, the original grant was cancelled and the land re-granted. All subsequent divisions of grants such as sales, mortgages, and leases had to be registered in the county registry offices.

RS637 RECORDS OF THE SURVEYOR GENERAL

Throughout the history of New Brunswick, the policy and procedures relative to the granting of Crown land has been affected by the immigration patterns which affected the entire "New World". In the mid-1820s a new Surveyor General, Thomas Baillie, instituted a policy designed to make the colonies pay for themselves and for the eventual removal of the civil, military and ecclesiastical expenses assumed by Parliament. Virtually independent of the Lieutenant Governor, Baillie proceeded to impose a thorough control over the Crown lands.

Contemtuos of the local aristocracy, he would press imperial claims to their utmost limit and fit the province into a new pattern of his own fashioning. To him New Brunswick was "an estate" whose harvests he would gather for the general benefit of the Empire and, only incidentally, for the welfare of the provincial population. His grand objective was to sell the wild lands of the province to outside capitalists of large means, to produce such a great sum that the interest from it could ensure the total cost of government. The success of such a policy would make the Lieutenant Governor and his officials totally independent of the elected General Assembly. The province could be reshaped and reoriented along new lines without the consultation or consent of the representatives of the people. Baillie made of New Brunswick the only colony in North America where the sale of land appeared to produce successful results.

In 1833, the House of Assembly considered proposals for taking over control of Crown land. It felt it could collect the revenues more cheaply and would, therefore, reduce the salaries of the Surveyor General and his "harpies." The constitutional issue involving the newly established executive and legislative councils added fuel to the crisis.

The general principle coming into favor at the Colonial Office was that each colony should acquire the management of all local revenues in return for a civil list that would guarantee the salaries of imperial appointees and take care of other fixed expenses which it considered important.

The delegates sent to London in 1833 by the Assembly to get control of the Crown lands and consequently reduce the salary and power of Baillie were unsuccessful. In 1836, they tried again and the Colonial Secretary in London agreed to surrender to the control of the New Brunswick legislature the crown lands and their revenue. Thus, the members of the House of Assembly found themselves in control of large new revenues and a capital sum of 170,000 pounds. The acquisition of Crown lands was an accomplishment that outstripped all other colonies on the road to reform. New Brunswick led the van of the movement for what was beginning to be called "responsible government."

With the ability to draw upon the revenues created by the exploitation of the vast forests and minerals of the Province, the government of New Brunswick could now fund social, economic, educational, and other improvements which were the mark of nineteenth century western development. Administratively, the development of the "party system" of government and the establishment of ministerial responsibility to the elected representatives within the General Assembly ensured a policy of controlled and beneficial use of Crown land. The office of the Surveyor General grew into the Department of Lands and Mines, which itself became the Department of Natural Resources. In the twentieth century much controversy has arisen over the hand-and-glove relationship of the Department with large forestry and mining companies which "developed" or "plundered" the natural resources of the Province, depending on one's point of view.

SCOPE & NOTES:

The records presently available for research are listed in this finding aid. The volume of these records measures about 12 metres covering mainly 1784 to 1867. Some of the bound volumes included here were previously in RS107 "Crown Land Administration Records" but, because that series was artificially created and held volumes from various functional jurisdictions of Crown lands administration, they have been now reunited with the "loose" documentation generated by the office of the Surveyor General. As is evident from the "Table of Contents", the records in this series are arranged according to function or form to reflect, as much as possible, the activities and functions carried on within the office of the Surveyor General. This organization also reflects the geographical jurisdictions of the various officials acting under the authority of the Surveyor General. Also, the finding aid describes the functions and contents of each record sub-series. The dates following the item description are those of the particular item. A list of the Surveyors General and Ministers is provided to assist research

Researchers should note that the records of the Minister of Lands and Mines / Natural Resources are contained in RS106.

7. DEPUTY SURVEYORS

(All the early deputies were Loyalists with military experience as engineers. Most lived in the regions they surveyed and held other jobs or positions. Besides surveying farm and town lots, they evaluated improvements, arbitrated minor disputes, supervised town settlements, verified old surveys, explored, mapped and reported on land, timber and mineral resources. The deputy surveyor was the Surveyor General's "man in the field", his "outdoor establishment".)

35. EXECUTIVE COUNCIL

(These Executive Council papers cannot be found written up in the minute books of RS6. The "In Council" notation on the back of the documents is in the handwriting of a clerk in the Crown Land Office. The documents in RS9, and recorded in RS6, have a council notation in the handwriting of a clerk in the Provincial Secretary's office. We feel the matters were handled by the Council but do not know why they were not included in the Council minute books. Perhaps there were separate books for them.)

- b. Certification of George Massy, as described above; London, March 16, 1775.
- c. Indenture (lease) of 20,000 acres of land on the Petitcodiac River from Joseph Gorham to Joseph Frederick Wallet Des Barres and John Grant, March 7, 1775.
- d. Indenture/release of the above agreement.
- e. Certification of William Waylen, Mayor in Wilts County, England, re appearance of Anne Gorham concerning the lease of lands described above, March 13, 1775.
- f. Indenture/release of the above agreement between Gorham, Des Barres and others.

RS637 RECORDS OF THE SURVEYOR GENERAL: INDEX

INDEX

The following index is meant to provide nominal and subject access points to the finding aid for the Records of the Surveyor General. Researchers should note that the records themselves have not been indexed; however, some of the records such as the Letterbooks have internal indices. Included in the index below are all surnames and other proper names as well as entries for subjects appearing in the finding aid. Entries which are in upper case are to indicate an index term which is a subseries.
